INITIAL QUEST: Find the Ornate Glass Bottle

YOUR STORY: Your family name carries weight in Long Beach—but not the kind you'd prefer. Your great-great-grandfather was Frankie "the Coast" Romano, the notorious rum runner who controlled bootlegging operations at the Port of Long Beach during Prohibition. The Romano family had it all in the 1920s-1950s: money, power, connections, Hollywood parties, political influence. But then came the IRS investigations in the 1960s-1980s. The government seized everything. Except, there are rumors about hidden wealth that escaped the IRS. The legendary "Romano Treasure." Is it real? Or just a desperate family myth? You learned the art world through necessity—selling salvaged family pieces to survive. But you discovered you actually had talent for it. You've built a legitimate art dealing business and made real money again. Though you still dabble in questionable provenance and black market connections when profitable. Old habits die hard. When you heard about the investigation at the old Montrose mansion—where your ancestor Frankie did business in the 1920s—you couldn't resist. Maybe the treasure is real. Maybe it's here.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Ornate Glass Bottle

YOUR STORY: You run a small antiquarian shop, surrounded by other people's memories—every item a piece of someone's story you can't bear to lose. Over the decades, your counter has quietly collected pieces of one story in particular: the Romano harbor years. A Venetian bottle with no paperwork. A dockmaster's ledger bought cheap at an estate sale. Photographs of longshoremen whose faces you've come to recognize. Sellers are always vague about origins, but one name keeps surfacing—Romano. You've never chased it. You just kept the pieces. Somewhere in the shop is a map of Long Beach's bootlegging years that no historian ever drew, assembled from things nobody else wanted. When you heard about the investigation at the Montrose mansion—where the Romanos did business in the 1920s—some of those fragments started to feel relevant. You had to come. You want to know what really happened down at that harbor.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Unfinished Wedding Dress

YOUR STORY: You're an orphan. You never knew your parents or where you truly came from. All you have is an old diary—worn, fragile, precious—that somehow ended up with you. The diary was written by someone named Eleanor. She writes about being adopted, about not knowing her real parents. She writes about searching for identity, for belonging. You don't know if Eleanor was your grandmother, great-grandmother, or some other relative. But her words speak to you across the generations. The diary contains a bread recipe—"my grandmother bread recipe," Eleanor calls it. You've been baking this bread your whole life and today you run "Sweet Rose Bakery", which has been featured on several popular food channels. Recently, you've started having strange feelings. Dreams. The face of a beautiful woman with a pearl necklace calling to you. A sense that you're connected to something bigger than yourself. When you heard about the investigation at the old Montrose mansion, something drew you here. You don't know why, but you feel like you need to be here.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Crystal Ball - Antique Scrying Sphere

YOUR STORY: You've always believed that the stars shape human destiny. Not in the horoscope-in-the-newspaper sense—in the real, ancient, mathematical sense. Planetary alignments influence events. Timing matters. The cosmos is a clock, and those who know how to read it can harness extraordinary power. Your obsession with the occult led you down countless rabbit holes, but one hit close to home: the notebooks of Sebastian Crane, a pharmacist and chemist from 1920s Long Beach. He combined ancient alchemical wisdom with modern pharmaceutical science. He was trying to bridge two worlds that everyone else insisted were separate. In your opinion, the man was brilliant. Ahead of his time. But his notebooks hint at more than chemistry—sacred alignments, visions, communion with the unseen. Most dismiss these writings as the ramblings of an eccentric. You believe he was documenting something real. When you heard about the investigation at the Montrose mansion—a place Sebastian walked in the 1920s, and where a presence is said to still linger—you jumped at the chance. You want to understand what Sebastian truly glimpsed, and hear what the spirits of that house have been trying to say.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Forked Root Specimen

YOUR STORY: You've been investigating the Montrose family for months. On the surface, they're old Long Beach money—respectable, philanthropic, well-connected. But you've been pulling threads, and the fabric is rotting underneath. It started with a tip. An anonymous source pointed you toward irregularities in the Montrose Family Trust—payments that don't add up, assets that moved in suspicious ways, and a chain of inheritance that gets fuzzy the further back you go. Who actually owns the estate? The legal trail should be straightforward for a family this prominent, but it isn't. Then you started finding more. The Montroses have a pattern. When something threatens their reputation, it disappears. People. Records. Problems. You can't prove it yet. But you have fragments. When you heard about the investigation at the Montrose mansion—and that people from multiple connected families would be gathering in one place—you saw your opportunity. Old houses hold old evidence. And people with secrets tend to reveal them when they're surrounded by other people with secrets. You're here to build a case.

YOUR STORY: You're a clockmaker and horologist—obsessed with time, timing, and the mechanisms that measure it. But you're not just about clocks. You study astronomical timing, consciousness, synchronicities. You believe the universe has patterns, that timing matters, that mystical experiences are real phenomena we're only beginning to measure. For years, you've been obsessing over a specific antique pocket watch from 1925. You've examined it in detail—every mechanism, every engraving. Inside, you identified a date and astronomical symbols you recognized immediately—the Jupiter-Venus conjunction. You calculated it. September 4, 1925, at 6:14 AM. A rare conjunction that happens once in decades. Someone thought this date was important enough to engrave it permanently. The Influencer featured the pocket watch in their "Long Beach Urban Legends" series with your expert commentary. You explained the conjunction, the timing, the mystery. They were skeptical (as always—they think your helmet project is pseudoscience too). But the episode led you both here, to this mansion, to October 1925 deaths that happened exactly five weeks after that sacred conjunction. This can't be a coincidence. The universe doesn't work that way.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Unfinished Wedding Dress

YOUR STORY: You're descended from Elias Monroe, the dressmaker who created Cordelia Montrose's wedding dress in 1925. The dress that was never worn. The bride who never made it to the altar. Your family has preserved everything from Elias's workshop—his tools, his sketches, his correspondence. But most importantly: the dress itself. White silk, delicate lace, perfect in every detail. A masterpiece that was never worn. Elias was in love with Cordelia. Everyone in your family knows this story. He sent her flowers, wrote her poems, and begged her not to marry Sebastian Crane. Yes, not everyone knows who Cordelia was engaged to. Few people even remember that name: Sebastian Crane. It's as if he was erased from history. But you grew up with this story. You grew up with the dress. You can't stop thinking about Cordelia—the romantic, tragic bride. You preserve her dress like a shrine. You research her life, her death, what could have been. Some people say your fixation is unhealthy. Maybe they're right. But you need to know the truth. What happened to Cordelia? Why did she die?

You knew you descended from Dr. Thaddeus Crane, a respectable town doctor from the 1920s. That's ALL you knew—the family buried everything else. Recently, you made a shocking discovery: Dr. Thaddeus Crane had a brother you've never heard about! When you heard about the investigation at the Montrose mansion, you knew you had to come. INITIAL QUEST: Find the Unfinished Wedding Dress

YOUR STORY: You work for a generational wealth management firm that has managed the estates of the Montrose, Crane, and Whitmore families for decades. These properties have been a professional frustration—the haunted mansion has been an eyesore and wasted asset for generations. While researching the Montrose estate, you traced the lineage to find the Heiress and contacted her about the unclaimed property. You hoped she'd take possession and finally do something with it. During your research, you discovered records about the Crane family name change—they became the Sinclairs in the 1960s, apparently for political reasons. You found a box of old papers connecting Dr. Thaddeus Crane to a brother named Sebastian Crane. You've never heard of Sebastian Crane, and you've been managing the estates for years! Now you've noticed some disturbing inconsistencies in death records from 1925, and you're determined to finally understand what happened. You've heard rumors about the ghosts haunting the mansion, and you can't shake off a strange feeling.

YOUR STORY: You're a treasure hunter and explorer—some call you an archaeologist, others call you a scavenger. You prefer "historical recovery specialist." You chase legends, track down lost artifacts, and search for hidden wealth. You've been researching the Romano family for months. Frankie "the Coast" Romano controlled bootlegging operations at Long Beach harbor during Prohibition. The family made millions. Then the IRS seized everything in the 1960s-1980s. But the numbers don't add up. The IRS recovered less than the Romano family supposedly had. Where did the rest go? The legendary "Romano Treasure"—cash, contraband, valuable goods hidden before the government came knocking. Your research led you to the old Montrose mansion. Frankie did business here in the 1920s. You heard there was a connection to the Montroses. The property has been abandoned for decades. If the treasure exists, it could be hidden here.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Unfinished Wedding Dress

YOUR STORY: You're a distant relative of the Montrose family—the mansion came to you through a complicated inheritance chain. Your family isn't particularly close; you barely knew about this Long Beach property until the Fiduciary tracked you down and informed you that you'd inherited it. At first, you were thrilled. A mansion! Your own place! Independence from your annoying family! You moved in immediately, thinking it would be a glamorous fresh start. Then you realized: it's haunted. Very haunted. Doors open by themselves. You hear footsteps. Cold spots in certain rooms. Sometimes you see figures in 1920s clothing. One room in particular—you refuse to go in there anymore. Something terrible happened in that room. You're scared, but also too proud to admit you made a mistake and move back. So you hired Margo Laveau, the psychic medium, to "deal with it." Now all these people have shown up to investigate. Part of you is relieved (safety in numbers), part of you is annoyed (this is YOUR house), and part of you is terrified of what they might discover. What happened in your mansion 100 years ago? And why won't the ghosts leave you alone?

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Ornate Glass Bottle

YOUR STORY: You're a fixer. Not officially, of course—on paper you're a lawyer specializing in "legacy estate resolution." But everyone in certain circles knows what that really means. When old money has old problems—sealed records, inconvenient documents, family skeletons rattling too loud—they call you. You make things clean. You make things quiet. You've handled work for the Romano family for years. Nothing dramatic—tidying up loose ends from the IRS seizures, managing claims against old assets, keeping certain documents from surfacing. Routine work. Until last month, when you were going through a box of sealed case files from the 1960s Romano investigations. Buried in the paperwork, you found something that made your heart race. Financial discrepancies. The IRS recovered less than the Romano family supposedly had. Where did the rest go? You know what hidden wealth looks like. When you heard about the investigation at the Montrose mansion—where the Romanos did business in the 1920s—you came to see what was buried. Because if there's one thing you've learned in this business, it's that old secrets have value. And this one could be worth millions.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Forked Root Specimen

YOUR STORY: You're a herbalist—part folk healer, part forager, part plant whisperer. You make tinctures, salves, and remedies from things most people walk past without noticing. You believe plants hold memory, that gardens tell stories, that the earth remembers what humans try to forget. A few months ago, you were foraging near the old Montrose mansion when something caught your eye. In the overgrown grounds, you found the remnants of a medicinal garden. Not decorative—functional. Wormwood, rue, lavender. Then you found something that stopped you cold: Damiana (Turnera diffusa). A subtropical plant native to Baja Mexico. It has no business growing in a Long Beach garden. Someone planted it deliberately, in a sheltered south-facing bed where it could survive. When you heard about the investigation at the mansion, you knew this was your chance to get inside and find answers.

INITIAL QUEST: Find the Forked Root Specimen

YOUR STORY: Your family has run the mortuary in Long Beach for over 100 years. Your ancestor, Silas Blackwell, handled the bodies of everyone who died in this town during the 1920s. Including three very important deaths in October 1925: Alice Whitmore, Sebastian Crane, and Cordelia Montrose. All within eleven days. So it's not hard for you to match the ghosts haunting the mansion with their real names. But the real question is: should you share that information? While people debate and blab, you can perform your own REAL investigation. And you have your first clue. Recently you found a record that someone paid Silas Blackwell $500 in 1925—a fortune at the time—with instructions to ask no questions and alter no records. But Silas kept his own private observations. He wrote down what he really saw. He documented the inconsistencies. And he hid those notes in the family archives. Now you have them. INITIAL QUEST: Find the Crystal Ball - Antique Scrying Sphere

YOUR STORY: You're a reporter for the local news. City council meetings, school board budgets, ribbon cuttings. Not glamorous. But you've been covering this city long enough to know where the real stories hide—underneath the official ones. You've written about the Montrose family more than anyone. Society page fluff, mostly. But over the years, you've noticed things. Questions that get deflected. Records that go missing. And one thing that's always nagged at you: for a family this prominent, the Montrose family tree has gaps. Names that appear and disappear, for instance. When the Heiress moved into the old Montrose mansion and started making noise about ghosts and investigations, your editor sent you to cover it. "Fun Halloween piece," they said. "Haunted mansion, local color." But this isn't a Halloween piece. There are people here from families you recognize from your Montrose research. There's a detective who's been circling the same family you have. There are documents, records, artifacts from 1925 surfacing in the same place, at the same time. This is the story you've been waiting for. The real one. The one underneath all those society page puff pieces. You just need to find it before someone tells you to stop looking.

You followed in his footsteps—plant toxicology, medicinal botany, historical uses of plants. Going through old family papers, you found Edmund's consultation records from 1925. A "pharmaceutical professional" (anonymous) came to him asking about: Digitalis purpurea (Foxglove)—extraction methods, dosing; Damiana, Valerian, Mandrake—sourcing and preparation; How to mask bitter flavors in medicinal preparations. The notes also contain consultation records with Harbor Import & Trading Co. The specifics raise your suspicions about what exactly this company was and what your ancestor was involved in. YOUR STORY: The Heiress commissioned you to restore and catalog the artwork in the Montrose mansion. Routine job. Old money, old paintings, old dust. You expected faded landscapes and stiff family portraits. Then you uncovered her. A portrait hidden behind a larger painting in the study—a young woman, mid-1920s, painted with extraordinary skill and unmistakable tenderness. The artist loved their subject. You could see it in every brushstroke. She was hauntingly beautiful. Dark eyes, a pearl necklace, an expression caught between joy and melancholy. You couldn't look away. You identified her as Cordelia Rose Montrose, born 1899, died 1925. She was only 26. You started researching. And what you found consumed you. Cordelia was magnetic—the kind of woman who inspired devotion. Men wrote her poetry, wrote her music. You've cataloged every piece of art in the mansion now, but you keep coming back to Cordelia's portrait. You've studied her face so long you feel like you know her. The admirers, the tragedy, the mystery of her death at 26—it's all tangled together. When the investigation began, you didn't leave. You couldn't. In 1925, a young woman named Alice Whitmore came to Célestine seeking help with visions she couldn't understand. Then Alice died—October 7, 1925, officially an accident. But her spirit reached out to Célestine immediately. Trapped. Restless. Murdered. Alice remained bound to the place she died: the Montrose mansion. For 100 years, she's been calling out to the Laveau family, generation after generation, but none could break through. When the Heiress contacted you about the haunting, you knew: this is Alice. You're here to finish what Célestine started.
